DISCUSSION

Anticipation of a large winter storm that will track through the region and bring impactful, accumulating snow Friday through Sunday. Dangerous cold will accompany this system, bringing single digit lows & below-zero wind chills through at least next Tuesday.

Snow character will be slightly on the drier side of what we normally see around the Ozarks this time of year. With no wet rain/snow mixes expected, snow will be fluffy and will accumulate efficiently. The longevity of the cold after the snow will cause the snow to become more compact with time, making it harder to remove the longer it sits after initially falling.

Snow chances increase after 6 PM Friday evening, last through the day Saturday, and decrease by Sunday morning. Snow will be the primary precipitation type for the entire area. If the system tracks farther north than currently forecast, then some mixed precipitation could be possible across extreme southern Missouri. Confidence in this occurring low.
